The Great Escape: Beating Jonas to the Punch

by Ralph Heimlich

I have skied at Maryland's New Germany State Park many times, sometimes returning from locations further afield, and often as a day trip (long day). One trail (the Cabin Loop, red) ends at the turn around of the road containing 11 log cabins built during New Germany's days as Camp S-52, Company 326 of the Civilian Conservation Corps (CCC) in the 1930's. I have tried to reserve a cabin before, but they were always booked up, especially on winter weekends. Just before WWII, many Washingtonians had skied at New Germany, which was Maryland's first ski resort. The German Ambassador had compared New Germany to the original, and christened it the "Little Alps". Last year, right after the ski season, I reserved Cabin #10 for January 23-26 (Saturday-Tuesday) since I was retired and hoped to attract other geezers or near-geezers. Little did I know what fate and meteorology had in store...

Up until the weekend before our trip, I thought the Mid-Atlantic had dealt us another dirty hand. There had been very little snow anywhere in our region, particularly in western Maryland. My email to participants included a bunch of hiking trail maps since I fully believed we were going to be reduced to ski-less travel. Lo, out the north, a mighty ice giant named Jonas materialized on Monday night, with NOAA warning of the blizzard of the century! As the forecast solidified, I quickly scrambled to revise our reservations since the brunt of the storm was going to occur on Saturday, the day we were supposed to be traveling up to New Germany. Unfortunately, someone was renting Cabin #10 on Friday (who goes up to a park on Friday if they can't stay the weekend?) but Cabin #9 was vacant, so I locked it down for the mandatory 2 nights (Thursday and Friday). As luck would have it, the previous occupant let discretion be the better part of valor and decided to decamp before Jonas' fury, so the park staff agreed to cancel my reservation for Cabin #9 and extend our stay in Cabin #10. Now to beat Jonas to the punch and get into the cabin before the snow became overwhelming.

John Tichenor came up from Richmond and spent the night at my house on Thursday so we could get an early start on Friday. Another car with Cathrine Payne, Edna Trimm and Sue Beffel were on the road early from Virginia, and Wendy Cox made the shorter drive from Lovettsville, VA by her lonesome. We all arrived nearly simultaneously, just as the dry, feathery snow began to accumulate. New Germany had already experienced about 5" earlier in the week, so it looked pretty respectable by the time the light faded on the shining lights of Cabin #10.

The New Germany cabins are mostly designed for family camping. Number 10 sleeps 5, with an optional fold-away bed for a sixth occupant. Two ladies occupied the sleeping loft in twins, one was in the solitary downstairs room, one unfolded the hideaway in the living room, and John and I shared the Queen in sleeping bags in the living/dining room farthest from the fireplace. Cozy quarters, but not cramped. G'night John Boy...g'night Billy Jo.

The last month of winter. What could be grander? The days are growing longer with light by several minutes each day, and temperatures are beginning to rise, even though most days remain pretty cold. These conditions herald a great time for Nordic skiing. We may or may not get a bonus snowfall in late February or early March like we have seen in the past few years. But if not, there is always the opportunity of good snow and favorable conditions further north along the Eastern Seaboard.

You will notice that the last trip on our current winter ski schedule (<http://www.patc.us/chapters/ski/trips.htm>) is to one of two possible venues in New York from February 25 to March 1. It will be led by Greg Westernik, one of the wisest snow sages in the Ski Touring Section and a decades-long member of STS. It’s a “Cancels if no snow” trip, but Greg knows what he’s doing. Many years there is great snow up in New York and New England at the end of February and into March. There has been several months for the base layer of compacted snow to grow, so that a few warmer days in the late winter do not mean unskiable conditions. And new snowfall during this time period is definitely possible.

I took a trip up to the Tug Hill area of New York in early March a couple of years ago with another long-time STS member. We went up on a Monday and returned on Friday. We skied in a different place every day and had a great time. Since we were skiing during the work week and we were both retired from our earlier careers, we largely “owned” the trails. For those of you who are retired, think about the increased time options you have for skiing during the winter season than those folks still working.

Different subject: The Ski Touring Section has been hosting a Nordic skiing Meetup group in the Washington metropolitan area for the past several years. See <http://www.meetup.com/Nordic-Skiers-of-the-Potomac-Appalachian-Trail-Club/>. The people joining the group were few in number during the first year, but those coming on board during the past year has been much stronger. As I write this, we have 210 members in this Meetup group. How many people to join on Meetup actually will participate on STS-sponsored trips is unknown. Some of the people who join are experienced skiers from the North and West who have moved to the mid-Atlantic region in recent years and want to keep up their interest in this sport. Others are newbies who want to try cross-country skiing. Some others are folks who have joined one or two dozen Meetup groups. One has to wonder whether many of the people in that latter group are active in any of the Meetups that they join! This winter we have had several of our STS trips advertised by our trip leaders on this Meetup site. This is a positive development. Some of the Meetup members have worked to organize last-minute trips when there is good snowfall in the area. These are all positive signs. If you are an experienced STSer, you may want to consider joining this Meetup group to get another option for finding good skiing opportunities in the area. Our primary aim is to use the Meetup group to find new skiers interested in joining the Ski Touring Section for all it has to offer.

And Now for Something Completely Different...Dogsledding

By Al Larsen

Do you like winter snow activities? (If not, maybe a cross country ski club isn't the best match for you, but we can leave that for another day). You've enjoyed day outings in West Virginia or Laurel Highlands, but thought that a multiday adventure in the deep woods would take this whole winter wonderland thing to a different level. Consider a dogsledding trip to Maine. My wife Anne and I did, and it's been one of the great outdoor adventures we've done.

Our friends Polly Mahoney and Kevin Slater are certified (and maybe certifiable) Maine guides who run canoe trips in the summer and mushing trips in winter. For dogsledding, they each have a pack of about 20 huskies. The social aspect of the dog hierarchy is one of the highlights of a mushing trip--who can be with whom, who is a strong follower, who is a good leader (who won't do anything but lead), who is looking for a chance to pick a fight with the other guy. But, first the set-up.

Polly and Kevin offer trips of several lengths--2 night, 3 night, week-long, or even a customized trip. Depending on your preference, your trip can be all mushing or a combination of mushing and xc skiing. Even on the all-mushing trips, you can take along xc skis and ski once you get into camp.

Anne and Al at camp in the Maine Woods

Speaking of camp, Kevin and Polly have permits to set up semi-permanent camps in the state forest around the Umbagog Lake area at the Maine-NH border. This means, at the beginning of winter season, they erect their traditional Maine Woods canvas wall tents, and leave some of the supplies that winter camping requires (cooking pots, etc.) there for the winter season, and strike camp before the melt. These tents have an inside-the-tent wood stove with a chimney that exits the tent through a heat-proof opening. That means that even when it's 10 degrees outside, you can be quite comfortable getting a meal ready. When you break camp to move to the next camp, you'll leave those basic items behind, and just have to take your food, sleeping bag, etc--but not the entire set of camp gear. That also means that when you get into camp, there is less set-up, and you have time to play some more if you wish.

Now, back to the dogs. Each sled has a team of 5 or 6 dogs. They get so excited about the prospect of running with the sleds, it's amazing to observe. We lead them one at a time from the truck with the built in individual kennels, and leash them up to the sled, which is securely tethered. Polly warns us ahead of time that things will be so loud that voice communication will be impossible. Everything will be hand-signals. She's right, if anything understating the pandemonium. The barking, yelping and jumping reaches a fever pitch as the dogs, knowing the drill by heart, realize that it's almost time to go. When Polly gives the signal, we release the slip knot tether with one hand, and the ice anchor with the other and we're off. Instantly, and I mean absolutely instantly, it's silence. Nothing but the sled runners moving through the snow. The dogs are ecstatic. And we're moving with non-mechanized power into a wilderness envi-

Before bed, I assayed a foray on my new snow shoes out the Cabin Loop trail by headlamp. The snow was deep and dark and my headlamp shone off swirling flakes the size of quarters, and glistened off the aluminum bands of hemlocks treated for Hemlock Woolly Adelgid (Adelges tsugae). I only stomped a couple hundred yards before the lights of the cabin and the streetlight at the turnaround were lost in the swirling snow. I quickly reversed course and followed my snowshoe prints back to the cabin.

A wise Genie once told me, "Be careful what you wish for". He might have been thinking about Snowstorm Jonas. On Saturday morning, we HAD snow, but there was too much of it for efficient skiing. It seemed light and dry as powder as you smooched down into it, but once your leg was encased in snow, you couldn't push through to make much forward progress. And, it was still falling at a pretty good clip. Saturday turned out to be a plow out and snow shoe day. The park staff got right on plowing out the cabin road and the main road in the camp. Then crews with shovels descended on the individual cabin driveways. We had to clear snow from our cars (they wouldn't risk damaging them), but once that was brushed off, the park crew shoveled out the driveway, tossing snow 3 and 4 feet over the mounded up whiteness. When it was all over, we offered our designated shoveler a tip, but he refused, saying Maryland Park employees can't take tips.

I set out on my snowshoes, intending to stomp the whole Cabin Loop (red). By the time I reached the junction with the Blue Trail, I decided to descend to the Turnpike (green) along the creek and head back toward parking lot #5. A family of other cabineers were sledding from the turnaround at the end of the cabin road, and I used their return route, smashing it down a bit more in the process. After lunch, Sue, Edna and I set out on snow shoes to finish the Cabin Loop and made it all the way around by the end of the day.

The New Germany cabins have all the amenities, but most of us didn't have cell service, and there is only WiFi at the warming hut in Lake House, overlooking the small reservoir. We spent part of each day there, eating lunch, warming over the fire, and catching up with Jonas depredations in the greater DC area and locally. Official word from the park rangers was that Garrett County held the Maryland record for the storm, with 38" falling in Red House, in the extreme southwest part of the county. We had about 28" at New Germany, and it was plenty.

By Sunday, the park deployed snow mobiles and started grooming the trails. It was literally tough sledding for the gas horses, and at one point a willful gasbagger headed for the creek without its rangler, ending up in the water on its side. I offered to help pull it up, but the park dispatched another Sno Do to do the deed.

The mountain people are a hardy bunch. I expected skiers from the local area on Sunday, after the snow stopped, but was surprised to see about the same numbers on Monday, and even on Tuesday. Folks said it was due to the schools being out and the love of skiing by the locals. One lady from Frostburg with her young daughter said that the university wasn't going to open until they could figure out where to PUT the snow that they were scraping off the parking lots.

Of necessity, we weren't going anywhere on Friday, Saturday, and even Sunday nights after the storm. We had prepared for soup and bread on Friday after driving, and a potluck dinner on Saturday. Most brought extra food in anticipation of possibly being marooned at the park, and I brought a backpacker stove and LED solar light in anticipation of potential power outages. We didn't need them, but it was nice staying in to cook. Without TV or internet, we were forced to entertain ourselves with conversation, reading and lots of engaging card games led by the master card shark, Catherine Payne. No fortunes were won or lost, but several of us had our rear ends handed to us by the diminutive Ms. Payne. By Monday evening, a bit of cabin fever had set in, and we drove the short distance over to Grantsville on well-plowed roads to eat at the historic Casselmann Inn, where roast turkey dinner was the nightly special.

Having skied Sunday and Monday, on Tuesday we piled in the cars to head for Swallow Falls State Park and the county seat at Oakland, MD. It was a pretty drive over there, and the Falls were impressive, even on the half-beaten down snowy path we took down to see them.

Muddy Creek Falls, the highest in Maryland, was especially impressive, being still mostly frozen in and covered with lots of snow. We stopped at the café in the Oak-Mar Motel for a light dessert/après snow repast before heading back to the New Germany.

On Wednesday morning, we were replete with skiing and snow shoeing, feeling somewhat guilty for leaving spouses or pets to their own devices in the snow-bound metropolis and ready to pack up and get out of Dodge by the 10 AM checkout time. We left the cabin in much the same spotless fashion as we'd found it, and vowed to return next year, hoping to beat Jonas' worthy successor storm in 2017.

Editor's note: Ralph Heimlich reliably informs me that the larger Cabin #11 (which sleeps 8 or 9) has been reserved for January 2017 for the rematch. Stay tuned if you'd like to try New Germany's snows.

ronment--across the lake, through the wooded trails. It's like canoeing the Maine rivers--there is something just "right" about this, aesthetically, spiritually, athletically. This is the way it should be done--straight sided canvas tents, cooking with wood. I like my lightweight backpacking/ kayaking tent and pocket rocket gas stove as much as the next guy--but, here they would detract somehow. Here, we walk out onto the frozen lake, with large buckets and a pole resting on the shoulders of two of us, to bust through the ice and submerge the buckets one at a time to get water for drinking and the cook and cleanup routine.

With everything set up, and still some sunlight left, I ski out from camp to the sound of--NOTHING. Just silence. Just wonder and appreciation that I get to do something like this.

On our particular trip, we'll be moving from one camp to another. So, in the morning, it's pack up, leaving the tents, etc. behind. This time, the dogs have been seemingly sleeping, not interested in the people at all. But, once again, they know the drill by heart, and when the preparation reaches a certain stage, it's pandemonium all over again, as they know that running time is near. And once again, it instantly goes from hand-signal-only loudness to silence, as we're off again, gliding over the snow.

Al, Anne, Liz and Walker: hot soup lunch on the mushing trail

I hope through these words to give even a dim glimpse of what such a trip can be, but, truly, I've never experienced anything like it, to compare it to, so I know that words cannot convey very much. If you love winter snow fun, like being outdoors, and want to combine those into something unlike anything you've ever done, put a mushing trip on your list. If you have flexibility to do this on short notice, you could get on a trip yet this season. If not, put it on your list for next year. Check out Kevin and Polly, their dogs, their philosophy and their trips at www.Mahoosuc.com.

Notes from Winter Storm Jonas

What follows is a collection of posts to the Yahoo Group site as Jonas came and went and people dug out to go skiing.

I skied out my door yesterday from Cleveland Park down Tilden and up to the Nature Center, where there was only one set of ski tracks. Beautiful and best powder skiing ever with not as many dog walker or snowshoe tracks. I plugged the club when I saw fellow skiers!—Kathy Hudson

The metropolitan branch trail has also been good skiing - only got cleared once, a few drifts but mostly pretty passable.—A.F. Goldfarb

> 38" in Garrett County and at least 30" here[New Germany SP]. They are grooming but mostly a snowshoe day. Broke the Cabin Loop and part of the Turnpike. Y'all come up, especially you retired geezers. —Ralph Heimlich

Great pics! I just got in from skiing in Rock Creek Park. Perhaps not quite as rustic but a lot closer! Next year when I retire - I'll join you!! —Talibob

Looks great Ralph. Unfortunately I am still working. Did get to ski my neighborhood in yesterday's sunshine. Enjoy! —Dick Simmons

We assumed this trip would end up being the first STS trip canceled on account of snow. Did you travel over on Saturday? We couldn't have gotten through even if we had wanted to. I'm thinking of going to NG this coming weekend if conditions stay pretty good. Glad to hear you made it over there and are now in the middle of wonderland.—Al Larsen

Yesterday, there was room for a couple of cars at the trail head off old Georgetown road just west of the beltway near the AL bridge – bring a shovel in case you need to clear more space – good skiing through the woods so far the hikers have not taken out the x/c tracks – the other trailhead parking lots off the road were still filled with snow.—Harrison Snow

I went out yesterday (Tuesday) with intent to ski the C&O Canal towpath. None of lock house parking lots were plowed. In fact, only one travel lane (instead of the two that exist) were plowed. I then headed to Carderock, but the road into the park was unplowed. I ended up skiing Gulf Branch Park in Arlington. I could see yesterday during my ill-fated outing that they had scoop loaders out, removing snow, not just pushing it (with plows having done as much as they were capable of). So, presumably that removal effort continues, and today folks (who, um, don't have to work like others of us), may find better access and more parking. If anyone does get out to Manassas, please post something on this Yahoo Group site. Also, if anyone has any info about New Germany conditions over the next day or so, please let us all know as well.—Al Larsen

Just got back to the car at Manassas Battlefield. Wet. Wet. Snow. Skiing is good. I did a nice little circuit of battlefield. Very windy. Nice sunny day. —Roger Hanson

We did go to Manassas today and it was quite nice. A few windblown or muddy spots, but they were easy to avoid. I was worried about more melting, but it appears that temps are going to drop tonight so it should still be good tomorrow I think. We went to the Visitor Center parking lot and it was completely cleared. Happy skiing everyone, after the blizzard comes the fun!—Dorothy Lange

On Monday the C & O canal looked pretty good. —Maryanne LeBlanc

I skied a little at a local park in Fairfax county. Conditions were great. The base is firm and there is a little loose on top so turns were easy. The areas in full sun are getting a bit softer on top. Just ski right on the virgin snow. I skied a little foot packed on the trail in the woods and that was fine. Going to a bigger park to ski some more. —Craig Kaoff

I took a day trip to Blackwater Falls State Park yesterday. There was some challenging driving through a whiteout at the end of Corridor H, but it was worth it. The conditions were perfect, no ice, groomed trails, and temperatures in the upper 20s. Only noise was skis on snow, and the sounds of trees rubbing together during wind gusts. The Red Spruce Trail was particularly enjoyable. —Eric Goodman

Like Eric I ventured out solo for a two night stay at the patc sugar knob cabin just off the Tuscarora trail in the great northern mountain region. Got a late start because of the need to pick up the key from patc when it was open. Luckily the road to the trail head at van buren furnace was plowed most of the way. Still it was midnight before I got to the cabin because of the deep snow, steep terrain and some confusing trail markings that had me wondering if I would need to bivouac. A pair of skins would have helped speed things up. Enjoyed the snow bound beauty and solitude. Except for my ski tracks and deer tracks there weren't other signs of people or animals. Accessing the area from wolf gap may be the best way to avoid the long uphill slog. Happy trails— Harrison Snow

While in Canaan this past weekend I reserved a DELUXE Canaan SP cabin at the AARP rate for Jan 26-29 2017. More on this later. Was a great trip, though the change in weather from Antarctica on Friday to Fort Lauderdale by Sunday was a bit jarring ... despite that, the snow stayed good.—Doug Lesar

A Canaan Valley Cabin Trip

By Doug Lesar

The late January (28-31) Canaan SP cabin trip has, more often than not, enjoyed excellent skiing conditions, and this year's event rated highly. The leader and seven other club members endured a cold and blustery first day where skiing in the open was less than desirable, but milder and sunnier weather on the second day provided less constrained skiing opportunities. By the third and final day, stripping down to shorts and tee shirts was almost an option and outdoor hamburger grilling at White Grass made for a spring-like feel. Only in West Virginia can you begin a weekend in Antarctica and end it in Fort Lauderdale.

Despite the rapid warm-up, snow conditions, apart from chronic and intractable wet areas on the infamous Cabin Mountain Trail, remained superior and best-of-season. Some of the group enjoyed shorter un-groomed journeys in Canaan State Park and others followed the leader into the furthest reaches of White Grass's backwoods. (Someday, somehow, the leader will eventually figure out how to escape the infinite loop of the Shenandoah Trail!) Several skiers took advantage of White Grass rentals to test possible upgrades to dated skis, boots, and bindings. With virtual extinction of availability of XC gear locally to DC, this has become one of the few options for STSers for purchase and test other than a shopping trip to New England or to the western US. After this year's reversion to a basic cabin, the club has reserved a deluxe cabin for January 2017 in hopes of an equally great if not better experience a year hence.
